REPORT

JUNG PERSONALITY TEST

Email address:	joshua.hickman1@gmail.com
Gender:	Male
Age:	33
Test date:	2018-03-28 07:16:30

Table of contents

Table of contents 1
Jung Personality Test Report 2
1. The Jung Typology 3
2. Your Jung Personality Score 5
3. Your Jung Personality Type: ESFP 6
4. Contributions to an Organization 9
5. Your Leadership Style 10
6. Your Communication Style 11
7. Problem Solving Style 12
8. Stress Profile 13
Triggers 13
Characteristics 13
Gaining Equilibrium 14
Lessons 14
9. Motivators 15
10. On a Team 16
11. Learning Style 17
12. Opportunities for Growth 18
13. Further Suggestions 19

Jung Personality Test Report

Carl Gustav Jung was a Swiss psychiatrist, an influential thinker and the founder of analytical psychology. The Jung typology is the result of the work of Jung, from which the Jungian Psychology originated. This is one of the world's most established and well respected models on personality and behavior. Tests using the Jung typology model are widely used by organizations for assessment centers, team building, coaching and personal development. The type indicator by Isabel Briggs Meyers is one example of this, although many versions, free and commercial, nowadays exist.

According to the Jung Personality Type Questionnaire you completed, the 'Type' that best describes your preferred style is: Extravert-Sensor-Feeler-Perceiver.

The nickname for this Type is "Entertainer" or "Performer" and it is shared by approximately 13% of the population. Thus, 87% of those you meet perceive the world around them differently from the way you do.

This report consists of thirteen chapters. These are:

1. The Jung Typology
2. Your Jung Personality Score
3. Your Jung Personality Type: ESFP
4. Contributions to an Organization
5. Your Leadership Style
6. Your Communication Style
7. Problem Solving Style
8. Stress Profile
9. Motivators
10. On a Team
11. Learning Style
12. Opportunities for Growth
13. Further suggestions

Enjoy reading your personal Jung Personality Test Report!

1. The Jung Typology

There are four dichotomous dimensions within the Jung typology. Each person is best described by one of the two traits within a dimension.

Extravert	Introvert
Extraverts are outgoing, energetic and action-oriented. They are enthusiastic and expressive	Introverts tend to be reflective, reserved and private. A popular misconception is that Introverts are shy - this is not necessarily so. They draw their energy from their own thoughts and the time they spend alone. Introverts do not need people around them all the time.
iNtuitive	Sensor
iNtuitives pay more attention to information that is imaginative and original. iNtuitives focus on the future.	Sensors live in the present. They rely on facts, handle practical matters well and like things to be concrete and measurable.
Feeler	Thinker
Feelers let their feelings and emotions play a leading role because of their concern for other people.	Thinkers make decisions using logic and impersonal analysis. They think with their heads rather than their hearts.
Judger	Perceiver
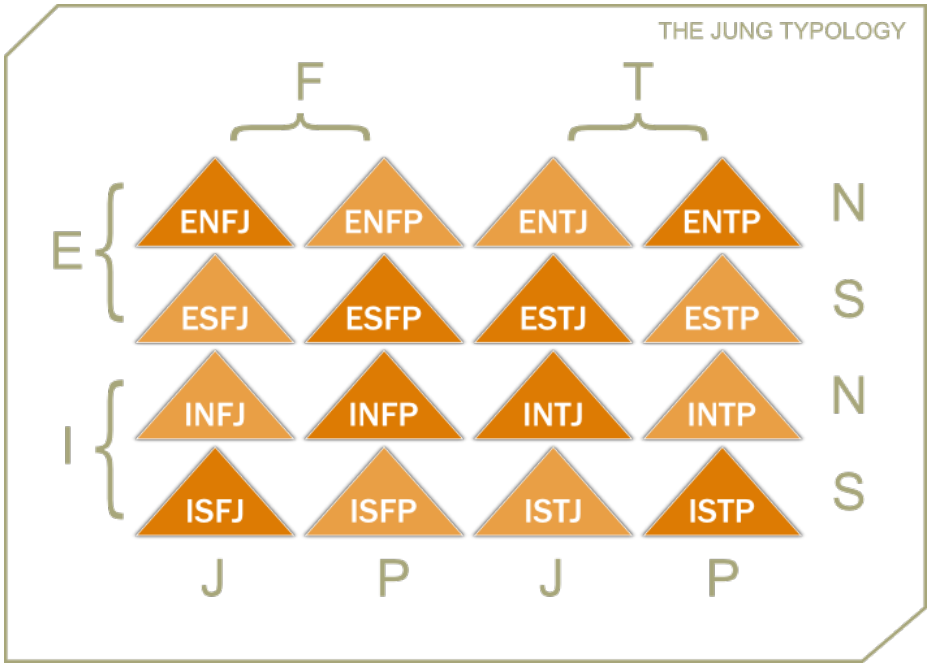
Judgers prefer a lifestyle that is decisive, planned and orderly. They like a life that is organized and controlled.	Perceivers prefer a lifestyle that is spontaneous, flexible and adaptable. They like an environment that is unstructured, and like to keep their options open.

Based on these dimensions, there are 16 identifiable types in the Jung Typology. In the diagram below a complete overview is presented.

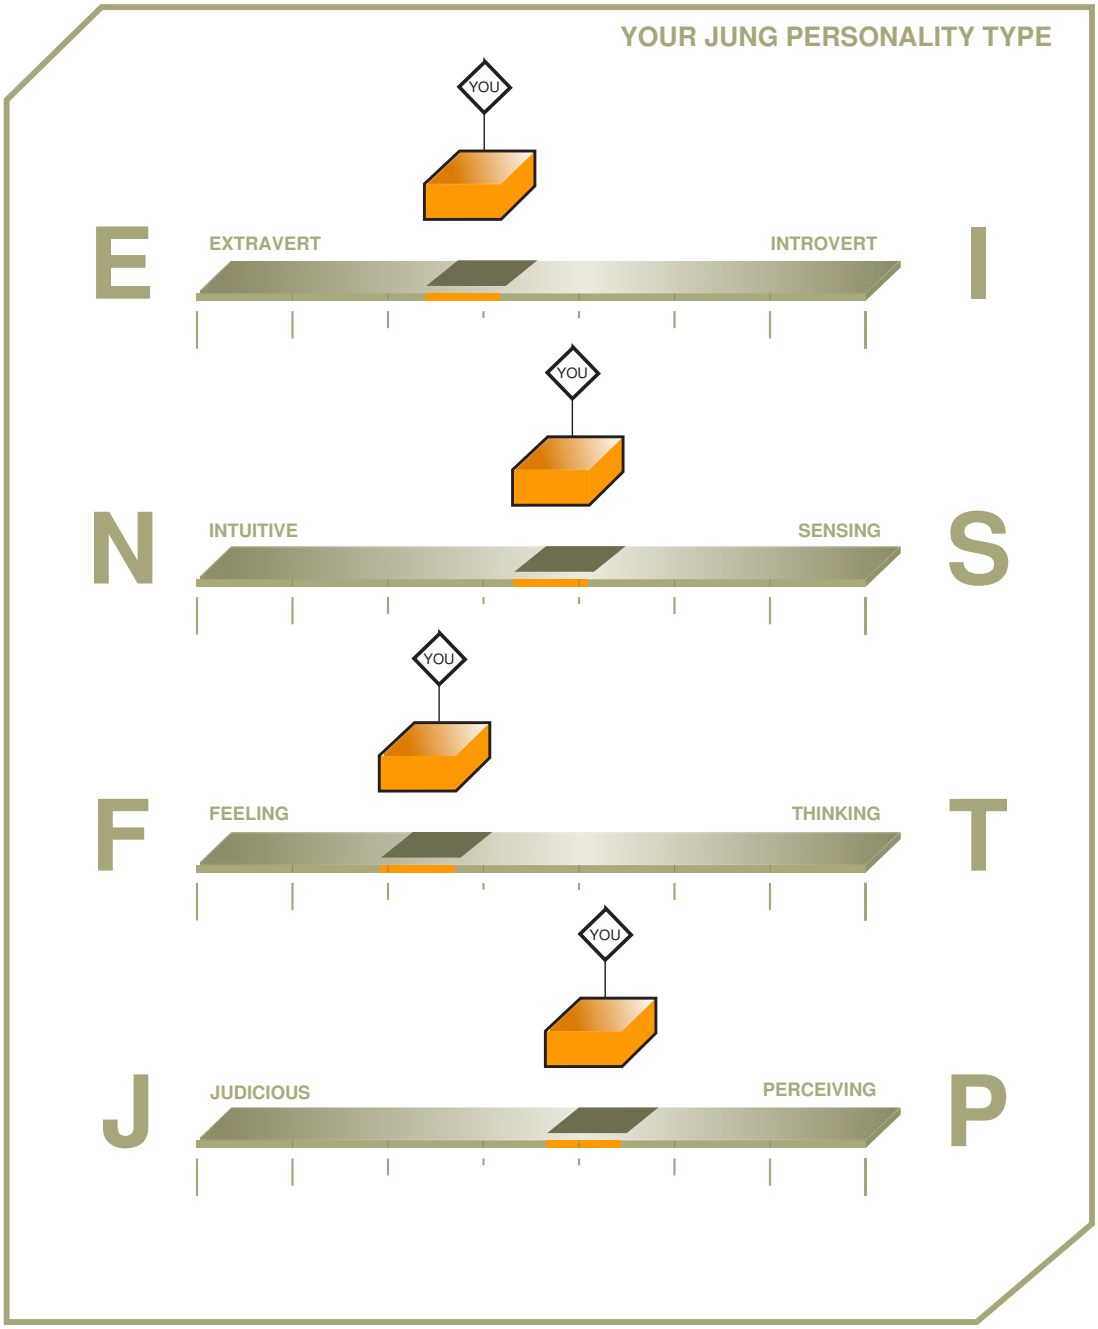


Every type has one or two nicknames, a title that best describes the specific Jung type:

ENFJ:	Mentor / Mobilizer	ISTP:	Operator / Artisan
ENFP:	Messenger / Journalist	ISTJ:	Trustee / Inspector
ENTJ:	Field Marshall / Commandant	ISFP:	Artist / Composer
ENTP:	Inventor / Improviser	ISFJ:	Protector / Nourisher
ESFJ:	Caretaker / Provider	INTP:	Architect / Designer
ESFP:	Entertainer / Performer	INTJ:	Scientist / Strategist
ESTJ:	Administrator / Supervisor	INFP:	Advocate / Campaigner
ESTP:	Promoter	INFJ:	Developer / Author

2. Your Jung Personality Score

Your specific distribution of scores on the Jung Personality Test produces a Jung Personality Type. In the graph below you can see you scores on each of the dimensions.



Scores at the far left or far right side of a dimension are your more distinct personality traits. Scores in the center area of a dimension are your less distinct traits.

3. Your Jung Personality Type: ESFP

As an ESFP, your motto could be "More fun per hour!"

> You approach life optimistically and are a master at living joyfully and entertaining others. You see the world as it is, approach it with curiosity, observe it well, embrace it openly and adapt to whatever life may send your way. As you process an experience with your five senses, your flexible, spontaneous and practical nature becomes apparent.

Being an Extravert, your good-natured realism is easily communicated to others. Because you also have open, Perceiving qualities, others may call on you to be a diplomat or mediator in a variety of situations. Since you tend to not impose your ideas or opinions on others, your uncommon and valuable ability to encourage agreement, compromise and suggest solutions is highly regarded.

> Overall, you are not one to work yourself up over political or philosophical pursuits. In fact, you may find yourself puzzled by those persistent idealists who continually try to make the world over according to their visionary model.

Your Sensing characteristic makes you a keen observer of the practical world. You find you have an exceptional ability to gather, sort and effectively integrate tremendous quantities of data. And your favorite material usually involves the personal realm, since people appeal to you more than things.

> Essentially, you are an impulsive person. You tend to be happiest living life as it comes rather than being confined by schedules, commitments, obligations, duties, rules, regulations and others' expectations. For you, it is imperative to be free to experience life directly and be able to continually experiment with it.

Activity makes the ESFPs of the world happy. As you are working on a project, totally absorbed in the activity, others might describe you as very disciplined or goal oriented. In truth, however, you are probably doing things simply for the sake of doing them, or are highly focused as you practice and perfect some skill.

> The ESFP person does not work for work's sake, but plays at work. Some of your greatest pleasure comes from experiencing peak moments when the work and the perfection of the moment come together. For you, your focus on the immediate present is so strong that the process and product become one as ends and means become inseparable.

Most with your particular combination of personality traits can work long hours on a task. You can be persistent, patient and determined when you feel like taking action on something. But, when that desire wanes, you may have a tough time completing what you started. If the nature of the work itself is slow, or if it involves long term projects, you may need to devise a few tricks to ward off boredom or your efficiency may suffer.

ESFPs have a remarkable ability to shift gears, changing from one project to another, one procedure to the next. Your Perceiving preferences may impel you to begin too many tasks without being asked, or revise material when it is not necessary unless you tap into the stability of your Sensing side. You will need to be aware of this tendency or many of these self-initiated projects could wind up in a file drawer, first delayed, then lost from memory.

You are at your best in a crisis and thrive on action. The challenge of handling unknown situations on a moment-by-moment basis is the biggest kick for you, especially when the outcome is the result of applying your well-honed problem-solving skills.

As an ESFP you are most contented when life is amiable, filled with good cheer, good friends and good times.

ESFPs truly enjoy great food, nice clothes, good housing and quality entertainment. As a result, you tend to devote significant time, energy and financial resources toward acquiring material possessions and living the good life. Enjoying life is important to you, and regardless of your financial situation, you will always find resources for fun and amusements. It is no wonder that people genuinely enjoy being around you and find your friendship a delight.

When circumstances get dreary, when too much anxiety surrounds you, when people start pressuring you with too many obligations, you will tend to ignore events for as long as you can. Eventually, you will remove yourself from any unhappy situation, but not before it has become extremely painful.

The challenge for your personality style is to achieve a balance between your happy-go-lucky nature and your ability to accomplish tangible results. Learning organizational and time-management skills, setting reasonable goals and achievable plans will be well worth the effort for becoming successful. Otherwise, your flexibility may be mistaken for wishy-washiness and your adaptability be perceived as a life with no direction or meaning.

When presented with a situation that calls for a choice between logical fact or feelings, your emotional side appears. It is your Feeling side that allows you to view the world with optimism, cheerfulness, enthusiasm, fellowship, warmth, and compassion.

You would prefer to ignore unwanted news and tend to avoid letting negative people affect you. You would rather see that your impact on the world and others is totally positive. As a result, it can be difficult for you to exert any form of discipline upon others, either at work or in your family.

> The best clue for understanding you is to examine your relationships with others. You are a true people person, diplomatic and mindful of other people's needs and expectations. You have an almost constant desire for friendship and rapport with others. You enjoy people and their comings and goings so much, that life around you might occasionally resemble a three-ring circus. This means that your friends and family had better be ready for a lot of spontaneous socializing. At work, your outgoing personality prefers working with people, so you may wish to think long and hard before accepting a job or work assignment that forces you to work in isolation. Overall, your work must involve working with others, either in person or by telephone at the bare minimum, for you to be happy.

Periodically, your generosity may be super abundant because you like to give to people, make others happy and strive for harmony. But on the down side, you may find yourself used or charmed by others, just because you avoid saying "No" to people. For the sake of your own well-being, being assertive, feeling comfortable in expressing your own opinions, saying "No" to the demands of others, looking out for your best interests and asking that your needs be met are skill you may need to develop.

4. Contributions to an Organization

Each of the sixteen personality types has their own styles, strengths and blind spots. The following items are the more obvious skills and talents you bring to an organization, group or relationship. These are your strengths. Strengths often can turn into weaknesses if over-used and over-relied upon. But used well, these strengths and talents can contribute to your success in career and relationships.

- Is courageous, creative and likes to be where the action is.
- Loves life and exciting challenges.
- Is enthusiastic, vivacious and keenly attuned to his/her environment.
- Is spontaneous and flexible in adapting to situations. Enjoys variety in work and tasks, and keeps many projects moving simultaneously.
- Spots trouble well in advance.
- Has enormous talent for getting people to work together.
- Is a natural negotiator and trouble-shooter.
- Enjoys hands-on work and lively, harmonious environments.
- Brings optimism and a friendly, outgoing, fun-loving nature to work.
- Is best in crisis situations and predicaments demanding immediate action.
- Develops ingenious shortcuts to obstacles in the physical world.
- Seeks challenge, excitement and heroic opportunities. Dares to go where angels fear to tread.
- Can quickly become over-extended and bored by strict routine.
- May be inconsistent in their organizational, orderliness and attention to detail skills.
- Quickly discards anything that is not immediately useful.
- Enjoys people, quickly understands what motivates them and has a cooperative spirit.
- Focuses on generating practical, tangible results that benefit people.
- Likes instigating change, continually grasps new opportunities.
- Is more loyal to projects and people than organizations.

5. Your Leadership Style

Each personality type has its own leadership style, strengths and blind spots. The following highlights your approach to leadership, provides clues as to how you will act in a leader role, and pinpoints some of your leadership qualities.

- Leads through promoting good will and teamwork.
- Is a jovial whirlwind of excitement and action.
- Inspires others through optimism, enthusiasm and caring for people.
- Focuses more short-term than long-term - has a sense of immediacy.
- Promotes and instigates action; is uncomfortable with ambiguity and uncertainty.
- Seeks to make an impact.
- Flourishes when faced with problems and challenges; masterfully handles crises.
- Is unafraid of change, creative solutions and taking big risks.
- Usually leaves implementation to others.
- Effortlessly pulls conflicting factions together; solicits feedback and input from others.
- Pays attention to relationships first, completing tasks second.
- Concentrates on getting followers to take ownership of a project or organization.
- Likes to act autonomously and call the shots.
- Expects to be followed, not questioned.

6. Your Communication Style

Effective communication is composed of two elements: how well you listen, and how you express yourself. Good communication skills are at the heart of success. Being aware of how we communicate, how others communicate and how we prefer others to communicate with us, is a significant step in achieving this objective. Your personality style has its own communication strategies that are more effective for you than other's communication styles.

- Speaks with energy and excitement.
- Replies quickly, thinking on his/her feet.
- Prefers talking in person, not communicating with written reports.
- Is concrete and specific in language.
- Is stimulated by conversations that can last forever.
- Has endless wit and abundant banter.
- Begins communicating by stating areas of accord.
- Offers presentations that progress in a roundabout fashion.
- Will consider a schedule, but avoids tight timetables in discussions.
- Is persuaded by emotionally presented, personal material.
- Communicates personal experiences to make points.
- Focuses on the here and now.
- Talks in terms of current possibilities and alternatives; information is tentative and adaptable.
- Focuses on current events, not future concerns.

7. Problem Solving Style

Different people solve problems in different ways. Based on your personality type, you will probably use the following methods and skills in problem solving:

- Expects to clean up the mess that others begin.
- Defines exactly what the immediate predicament is.
- Discovers what people are currently doing to solve the problem.
- Looks to see what was done previously.
- Seeks an innovative approach with tangible, practical results.
- Considers what will be gained or lost with each alternative.
- Reflects on the outcome and its affect on individual and group harmony.
- Is most likely to ask if change will work, if it is practical and if other viewpoints have been considered.
- Identifies those committed to carrying out the necessary plan.
- Looks at all the facts, next considers people, then applies logic and finally looks at the larger picture.

8. Stress Profile

Stress plays a significant factor in our abilities to be effective at work and have healthy sustainable relationships. The greater the stress, the harder it becomes to maintain quality work and quality relationships. Each personality type has strengths and blind spots. Under stress, blind spots emerge and people rely on their least favorite functions to operate. Below are a few clues as to how stress affects your particular personality type (Note: you and one other type have matching patterns in manifesting and managing stress, so you may find someone with an almost identical profile).

Triggers

- Being surrounded by too many serious people and judged for being easygoing and carefree.
- Having too many duties, obligations or responsibilities.
- Being forced to make decisions about distant prospects.
- Having to conform to someone else's schedule or structure.

Characteristics

- Loses their easygoing agreeable nature.
- Becomes pessimistic and worried, taking feedback from others way too personally.
- Their good-hearted humor tends to evaporate.
- Withdraws from the world, feeling lonesome and gloomy, quiet and sad.
- Feelings of isolation may produce significant anxiety because they are so unfamiliar.
- Can easily feel overwhelmed and overburden by a multitude of competing possibilities.
- Begins to doubt themselves and their abilities, fearing others will view them as incompetent.
- Thinking becomes confused, foggy and somewhat illogical.
- May experience towering fears about losing their health, mental abilities, work or relationships.
- Interprets random or innocent events as ominous signs about the future.

- Any change is seen as either depressing or threatening.

Gaining Equilibrium

- Episodes are usually quite brief.
- Gaining control of situations and fears by creating rational and sensible contingency plans.
- Solitary activities where they have control such as working in the garden or exercising.
- Being listened to without judgment or criticism.
- Getting an analytical reality check to bring their imagined fears back into perspective.
- Finding activities or solutions connected to making a difference for people.
- Letting others make decisions for awhile.

Lessons

- Becoming more comfortable with, and less fearful of ambiguity.
- Gaining confidence in making decisions about future unknowns.
- Acquiring appreciation for and building trust in their intuitive abilities.

9. Motivators

People are usually most effective when their environment matches their preferences and work style. When a good match is not present, it will be more difficult to achieve results. Below are some of your work preferences and key characteristics that you look for in work, or that you try to avoid. These key characteristics also indicate how you would typically like to be managed or related to. If you find these comments of value, it might be very worthwhile to share and discuss this section with your manager.

- Wants harmonious and pleasant surroundings.
- Prefers projects that generate short-term, practical results for the betterment of people.
- Wants frequent opportunities to interact with people.
- Excels in work that is playful and enjoyable.
- Requires an abundance of positive feedback and recognition.
- Desires support people to do the actual implementation of his/her solutions.
- Seeks crisis situations where he/she can excel.
- Wants hands-on projects, not theories, models or abstractions.
- Thrives when solving concrete, tangible problems.
- Wants immediate action.

10. On a Team

Some people work well on teams, others work best on their own. Understanding the personality types of team members provides information about how individuals are likely to carry out their work and interact with each other. Given your personality preferences, the following are the strengths and possible blind spots you will most likely bring to a team:

- Entertains, breaks the ice and keeps others inspired and working through his/her excitement.
- Builds morale and an esprit de corps.
- Enthusiastically invites everyone to participate and join together.
- Encourages team members to bring about positive achievements.
- Gets the ball rolling and then summarizes team decisions.
- Clearly states tasks and objectives.
- Is concerned with present realities.
- Can annoy team members by personalizing events too much and not focusing on the task.
- Frustrates others by not paying attention to concepts or theories.
- Can irritate co-workers by overusing humor or clowning around too much.
- Becomes irritated by others who find fault and are cynical, gloomy or contrary.
- Is vexed by any plain-spoken, insensitive, intolerant and rude behavior.
- Is annoyed by wasting time, lengthy boring meetings and abstract discussions.

11. Learning Style

For many years it has been known that different personality types have different ways of learning. Knowing how a person learns is a big advantage for structuring on-the-job training or classroom instruction. Once again, you may find this section valuable to share with your manager. Your learning style is as follows:

- Feels there is much to gain when learning is fun, grounded in the present and fosters relationships.
- Needs interaction, group projects and hands-on experiences - reading, listening and observation are not enough.
- Believes "doing things" comes first, grasping theories comes second.
- Maintains interest by seeking to understand how material is useful, practical and helpful now.
- Enjoys problem solving, particularly when concrete directions are demonstrated rather than when left to read them on his/her own.
- Prefers caring instructors whom he/she can get to know well and who take a personal interest.
- Is disturbed by class arguments and intellectual conflicts.

12. Opportunities for Growth

As we grow and mature, it is important to pull back from our favorite ways of doing things and build skills in the areas of our least favorite preferences. We thereby become a more balanced and versatile individual. The following suggestions address some of your more obvious blind spots and are areas to pay attention to if they have been ignored up to this point:

- Pay attention to balancing tasks with socializing.
- Practice prioritizing people, events and goals.
- Work toward completing tasks in a timely manner.
- Learn to develop the critical skills of planning ahead and preparing properly - your "busy-ness" and desire for action keeps you from doing this.
- Watch that you do not become swayed by the newest excitement that comes your way - learn what you need to do to finish projects before starting new ones.
- Be aware that because you easily become bored with projects, you probably have a tendency to jump on the next bandwagon or change courses in mid-stream just to keep life interesting - this is potentially detrimental to an organization.
- Train yourself to value and work with different kinds of information - your optimism and attention to personal information can lead to disregarding logical facts.
- Practice dealing with conflict, working out differences is part of the creative process - coming to agreement, building consensus and finding solutions.
- Pay more attention to the "big picture" and the future while balancing present concerns.
- Focus on the long-term implications to see if the shorter solution is really going to work - although the "quick fix" is attractive it can be deadly.
- Be aware that because you are so generous with your time and possessions, you run the risk of over-extending yourself.

13. Further Suggestions

Sharing your report and getting feedback

You might like to share your report with other people who know you well, both in work and non-work situations. Ask them if they think that it is an accurate description of your personality.

Resume/CV

If you are a job seeker we suggest that you might also like to let a prospective employer know your strengths and key values to an organization as defined by this Jung Personality Test. So why not include these on your Resume/CV? For example you could copy and paste the following:

- Is courageous, creative and likes to be where the action is.
- Loves life and exciting challenges.
- Is enthusiastic, vivacious and keenly attuned to his/her environment.

Copyright © 123test® 2019